Ghostbirth 2

Elena, a German woman arrives in Bangkok after years of failed fertility treatments. IVF, hormones, clinics. Nothing worked. She has heard of a massage studio that can cure infertile women. What she doesn't know: thirty years ago, a pregnant woman died in a fire in this house. The locals avoid it. The ghost never left.

Saul, an English expatriate taxi driver, drops Elena off and senses something wrong. He warns her. She cuts him off. She has not come this far to listen to a stranger's ghost stories.

The women in the house receive her warmly. No forms, no check-in. A woman kneels and removes Elena's shoes. A maternal gesture she has never received in any clinic. She is led upstairs to a small room. On the dresser stands a faded photograph of a pregnant woman.

Inside, Elena surrenders to the treatment. The masseuses wash her feet, feed her a thick red drink, massage her with hands that feel impossibly deep. Her body begins to change. Her belly swells. In the shower, she presses her ear against a water pipe and hears something moving inside the walls, like blood through a vein. She notices a door in the hallway. A paper sign: THIS ROOM DOES NOT EXIST. Red light pulses beneath the frame.

Saul finds Elena's medical records in his taxi. Clinic documents, IVF protocols, years of failure. He drives back to the house. The receptionist smiles warmly: there is no Elena here. No guest by that name. From the street, he looks up. Her silhouette in the window. There for a second, then gone. He is holding the medical records of a woman who does not exist.

When Elena discovers a hidden room of living flesh in the basement, walls pulsing, the air wet, the room breathing, she tries to flee. She collapses on the street. But the child inside her kicks against it, pulling her back into the house. The masseuses find her on the asphalt. They are not angry. They kneel beside her, stroke her back, bring her inside. A masseuse washes her dirty feet without a word. Elena lets it happen. Her eyes are wet. Not from fear. Something else.

The massage that follows breaks her open. Warm hands on her abdomen. Exactly where the ultrasound probes went in Germany. No instrument. The hands simply stay. Elena cries. Her body surrenders to a tenderness it has never known. She is touched.

After that, she is a different woman. She is pregnant.

Saul follows the masseuses to a Chinese cemetery and witnesses a ritual at the grave of the woman who burned. He realizes Elena is carrying a dead woman's child. He returns to save her.

She refuses. She has made her choice. When Saul insists, the house traps him. The masseuse's hands sink through his skin. Tubes grow from the walls into his body. Elena watches how the house absorbs him.

Then her water breaks. She descends into the basement, which has become a womb. Flesh walls, flesh floor, flesh ceiling. In the center stands a birthing chair. She kneels into it. Her body fuses with the structure. The shot is the one from the opening. The circle closes. She gives birth. We do not see what the child is.

Fire engulfs the house. Like thirty years ago. Elena tears herself free, takes the child, and walks out into the night. A mother.
